

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?

Coaching Parables: Coaching, Wisdom, and the Power of Stories

ROD MURROW
St. James Academy
Lenexa, Kansas
rodney.murrow@gmail.com
913-523-6570

LYDIARD, THE BEACH, AND THE BOYS

Arthur Lydiard makes a point by using a beach, but makes his Olympic gold medalists figure it out for themselves.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to figure out “which sand to run in” for themselves?

2. When was a time someone made you figure something out for yourself and how did that lesson stick with you?

THE TEAM, THE COACH, THE QUITTER, AND THE LESSON

The top runner on a college cross country team abruptly quits three days before the conference meet on their home course. What happened next changed the lives of everyone on the team.

1. What opportunities do you give your athletes to rise to the occasion for the benefit of one of their teammates?

2. How would YOU have voted?

25 DAYS

A high school athlete makes the mistake of assuming he won't run in a cold rain and it becomes a great teachable moment, but not in ways he expected.

1. How do you help your athletes see the sport as their "orange"?

2. What are some ways you can find other instances to use to teach the same kinds of lessons?

LESSONS FROM THE STARTING LINE: Irrelevant AND Invaluable

A high school girl's crush race anxiety prompts an epiphany.

1. Are you send the message that the sport is important or valuable?

2. What are some ways to counter the cultural message that sports are important rather than valuable?

LIGHTING THE WAY FROM BEHIND: A Lesson for Coaches and Parents

Preparing to give the eulogy at my father's funeral made me recall an event 30 years earlier and finally understand what he was trying to teach me.

1. Do you "prepare the child for the path" or do you "prepare the path for the child"?

2. Do you light the way from the front, or from behind?
